

ABSTRACT

A packet router uses high-speed superconducting circuits to process incoming data bits, read the packet header, and pass the packet header to a non-
5 superconducting semiconductor controller. The controller determines the appropriate destination for the packet, and sends corresponding control signals to a superconducting router. The superconducting router routes each packet to its intended destination based on 10 these control signals.